It is frequently said that silk was never so cheap in price as at present, but this must be qualified by the statement that it was never so cheap in quality. The demand for low-priced silk has led to such adulteration in manufacture that the price will be little if any lower than the price of a quarter of a century ago. This is true, notwithstanding the increases of production and the improved labor-saving machinery. It used to be that a good black silk dress was almost handed down to the second generation There are many women who still admire the rich appearance of black silk, but too often it is proved that its durability has been lost.
